UMass Lowell is a public university committed to preparing our students for work in the real-world— solving real problems and helping real people— by providing an affordable high quality education.

UMass Lowell is one of five campuses of the University of Massachusetts system. Our roots in Lowell stretch back more than 100 years. Our buildings line the banks of the Merrimack River as it swings through one of the most historic cities in America, a place where our nation’s Industrial Revolution began. But our history is just a springboard to the future. Students and scholars here are immersed in the most important issues facing today’s society.

This city and region and our campus have always been identified with invention and innovation. The tradition continues today in the classrooms and laboratories of UMass Lowell. We are on the leading edge of the knowledge economy. Massachusetts and our country must move forward on the strength of intellect and imagination. Author Thomas L. Friedman calls brainpower the new oil in the 21st century global economy. That is the kind of energy policy that we understand at UMass Lowell.

Equality of opportunity in employment is paramount to the University of Massachusetts Lowell in our pursuit of a diverse campus community. We believe this is essential for the communities we serve and to enhance the academic experience for our students. It is our express policy that factors such as race, color, national origin, religion, gender, disability, age, sexual orientation, marital status, veteran status or military status, will not be used to determine merit in employment in accordance with state and federal statutes.
